This lecture contends that research on gender and crime has been shaped, and limited, by select stereotypes about women offenders. It focuses, in particular, on the influence of the pathways perspective on gender-responsive programming and the limitations of this approach in light of research conducted in both the U.S. and Europe.

Candace Kruttschnitt is a Professor of Sociology at the University of Toronto, and a member of the Scientific Advisory Committee for the Netherlands Institute for the Study of Crime and Law Enforcement.
