

MULTIPLE OFFENCE SENTENCING

People often assume that most criminal offenders are convicted of a single crime. However, in reality about half of offenders are convicted of more than one crime – often several. The high proportion of “multiple crime offenders” poses a number of practical and theoretical challenges for the criminal justice system. In particular, how should courts punish multiple offenders relative to individuals who have been sentenced for a single crime?

The recent publication of Sentencing Multiple Crimes, edited by Jesper Ryberg, Julian Roberts and Jan de Keijser (Oxford U.P.) provides a path-breaking collection of essays on this very important but neglected topic.

In this seminar we will hear from three scholars who have contributed to this book, and from a judge who regularly passes sentence in the Crown Court. There will also be significant time for discussion. The aim is to explore thoroughly both theoretical and practical aspects of this key topic.
